OBJECTIVE

This Peer Exchange Session of the Global Platform for Sustainable Cities (GPSC) brings together city representatives and financial experts to share experience on how to access climate finance. What works? What is needed? How can we ease the process?

Local governments are at the frontline of climate action. They have vast potential to support achieving the Nationally Determined Contributions (NDCs), even to raise the level of ambition of the targets of the NDCs. Local climate action plans are being developed, with implementation projects seeking investors and investment. Yet, subnational governments still often struggle to access finance required for sustainable, low-to-no emission, climate resilient development.

With existing good practice, available tools and expertise specializing in guiding cities to develop robust and bankable projects, this session brings information and knowledge to city representatives - also encouraging them to share their experiences with each other. The peer-to-peer exchange will focus on approaches taken, exploring what worked well and why.

The session provides a platform where local governments can interact with financial experts, helping each other to better understand the challenges they face, and how to design transformative and investor-friendly projects, that are part of a coherent climate action plan which meets the requirements of financial institutions.

This interactive session offers a unique opportunity to showcase achievements, inspire each other, exchange ideas, and find solutions together.

OUTCOMES

Participants will leave the workshop session with:

- Information and knowledge on good practices in accessing finance.
- An improved understanding on how to design robust, transformative and bankable projects.
